Mark's New Life

Mark Walton lived in Germany with his family, but two years ago a company in England offered him a job. The money was good so he took the job. Now, he lives in a small house in North London. His family didn't come with him because his wife has a good job in Germany and the children go to school there. Every month Mark spends some time with his family. Sometimes he goes to Germany and sometimes his wife flies to London with their two children. When they come to London, Mark takes them to interesting places. Sometimes they go out of London. At their last visit, they took the train to Scotland and stayed in a village. When Mark goes to Germany to see his family, they always spend time at home. They don't have any visitors, even Mark's parents!

___77___

- I. 30% of Americans and 25% of Europeans are fat. Many of them are teenagers. In fact, there are fat farms even for young people in the United States. In these special camps, people cannot eat chocolate, hamburgers, pizza, and other junk food. Instead there is a diet of fruit, vegetables, brown bread, fish, and other healthy food.
- II. Why is junk food bad for us? The answer is simple. It contains a lot of sugar and fat. We need both of these things, but junk food has too much of them. People in Europe and America eat 20 times more sugar and 5 times more fat today than in 1800. This is one reason why so many people die of heart disease.
- III. However, even health food isn't always healthy. Modern farmers and food factories use more than 3000 chemicals. Some are fertilizers. These help plants to grow. Others are pesticides. These kill insects. The third group are hormones. These make animals and plants grow bigger and faster. Finally, there are additives. They make food look better, taste better, and last longer. So are these chemicals bad for us? If we eat too many of them and not enough fresh, natural food, yes!
- IV. Another important food issue in the world is meat. More and more people think it is wrong to kill and eat animals. In fact, today, 5% of Europeans and Americans are vegetarians. But rich countries still eat a lot more meat than poor ones. A person in America eats 110 kilos of meat in a year. In India, a person eats 1.1 kilos a year.

V. Some rich countries actually produce more meat than they need. Europe, for example, stores tons of beef. There are tons of butter and sugar, too, as well as milk and wine. Several countries even pay their farmers not to grow food. And why does this happen? Because rich countries grow too much food and poor countries grow too little.

Text 3

A Short History of Television

I. John Logie Baird produced the first television pictures just eight years after the First World War. They were in black and white and not very clear, but he showed the world that the principle worked. Early sets cost as much as a small car and not many were sold. Very soon, though, his original system was improved and, in 1936, Britain's first regular TV programme went on the air. Great Britain wasn't the only country producing programmes. Other European nations, including Germany, were also involved in the early days of television.

II. The real TV revolution began in the US after World War II. TV stations began to open in almost every city, and national networks made programmes which were seen from coast to coast. One of the American networks—CBS—developed colour service as early as 1951. Two years later, TV took another important step when it showed a big international event, the coronation of Britain's Queen Elizabeth II. It was the first time that a worldwide audience of millions saw history take place in their own homes.

III. By the end of the decade, TV culture was becoming a fact of life on both sides of the Atlantic. Even so, lots of people didn't have TV sets and many experts thought it wouldn't be that popular. That all changed in the '60s and '70s, as television started to satisfy the public's interests, not just for entertainment but also for quick, accurate information. As more and more sets were sold, the importance of TV news quickly grew. After all, what other machine could show you live, as TV did, Neil Armstrong's first steps on the Moon in 1969?

IV. Since 1980, there have been three more major developments. The first is video, which has given the viewers the power to control what they watch and when they watch it. The second is satellite TV. Thanks to direct broadcast satellites, dozens of new channels are now available to anyone who buys a receiving 'dish'. Many of these specialise in one kind of programme such as news, sport, cartoons, music, or movies. Thirdly, there is high definition television which now offers a much clearer and more realistic picture than was possible even a few years ago.

V. So... more channels, more choice, more clarity. What is there left for TV to accomplish in the future? The answer is two-way communication. Modern technology means that future televisions will be linked to computer data banks. This way, viewers will be able to ask questions (via remote control) about what they are watching and the answers will appear on their screens. This idea is called 'hyper-media' and it has not been tested yet. But then, as we have just seen, TV has come a very long way in a very short time. The hyper-media revolution could happen sooner than many people think.

- I. Hamsters, which are normally kept as pets by millions of children, are helping scientists to understand whether violent teenagers are created by a violent childhood. Hamsters have in their brains the same chemical signals that regulate behaviour in human beings. Scientists are carrying out studies that focus on the chemicals in the brain which regulate aggression. These studies demonstrate that, when the brain chemistry in young hamsters is affected by fear, they become extraordinarily anti-social and violent towards their fellow animals.
- II. These findings add weight to the belief that aggression in adults can be blamed on being neglected or treated badly as youngsters, as opposed to the idea that some people are born violent.
- III. Social scientists think they can help children who become aggressive when they face failure, disappointment, and frustration, but the earlier they can intervene during childhood the better. This suggests that genetic behaviour can be changed or modified by upbringing. Another obvious example, heart disease, which is known to be genetic, is also made worse by stress and other environmental factors.
- IV. The relationship between genes and the environment, particularly diet, in affecting people whose behaviour reveals criminal tendencies is also being studied. This research is building on a study that shows some connection between sugar consumption and violent behaviour.

V. Studies carried out in a US prison show that when the prisoners' diet was improved, the incidence of violence and anti-social behaviour fell by 40%. It seems that good nutrition can make a difference in behaviour. Other studies show that diets with limited amounts of sugar and refined foods also reduce suicide rates.
